

To E. M. L. Roche

"Some incidents in the lives of your great-grandparents John & Mary Elswarth."

Aunt Rachel Emily
London.

New Year's eve. 1945.

The first I know of <sup>my</sup> grand mother - then Mary Cockshott, was, when she was living with <sup>her</sup> brother - a bachelor, he was much older than she - and was a tall gaunt, & not very pleasant person. a real old fashioned hard shell Baptist.

He made a good deal of money. Learning in those days was paying well - like all the rest of the farmers in Craven, his great desire was to buy land. Mary was quite sufficient. She was very small and dainty. Gay & sweet tempered. These two were looked after by a housekeeper a sour, old, spinster, called Ellen. They were living then, at a nice old farm called Deepdale Head - of course belonging to brother Thomas.

Mary must have been very pretty. She had deepset dark grey eyes with long lashes, Auburn hair, & a lovely skin. She had also tiny feet & hands. She was very proud of her small feet, & would always wear black silk stockings. This was an almost-unheard-of extravagance in those times - The farmers wives told her that only Queens, & Duchesses wore silk stockings, Mary piped up, "Yes, I know. Queens, Duchesses, and Mary Cocksfoot." She insisted upon wearing black, silk stockings all her life, & they must be of good quality silk with clocks.

Their first mental picture, is of a journey, she often told of - when she was old.

When she was quite a girl, they had a very hard winter - and winters were winters in those times. They had a terrible snow storm Lasting for days without ceasing.

Thomas began to worry about his sheep on Foxcup Farm, away up in the dales, he told Mary he must ride up & see about them, so plucky little Mary said "I will come too."

"Nout ut soart" impossible, just look out at it, but "I will come" said Mary.

So she put her saddle on her Galloway pony, & jumped up. She wore a flowing green habit, & a green hat with a red feather. (Your mother, Annie & I have all ridden miles on that saddle, it was most comfortable, it had a wash leather non-slip seat, with fancy stitching, only one crutch & a little slipper, so much better than the latter day stirrup - we always

(new) it - as Grandma's saddle.)

The two of them started off from

Deepdale Head in the early morning, & rode through Long Preston - round by the Church, & up the moor road - through the thick snow. & thicker they went up the moors, & thicker the snow became. but - on and up they rode.

When they got past Seale - the snow drifts were so high - they covered the 6 ft. stone walls - but up there - the snow was frozen so hard, they gaily rode right-over the tops of the walls & hedges.

As far as they could see - there was only snow, snow, & more snow, but for here & there a few tops of tall fir trees; & once or twice a lone shepherd, trying to dig out his sheep - The only sound a curlew's plaintive call, as it circled over their heads.

How charming little Mary must have looked in her green habit, and green hat with the red feathers, her red curls flying - & face all pink with the frosty air; the only spot of colour is all that white & pines -

Ingeboroug is in front - and Pennington along side them - When they get to the top of the dale. They see 7 o'clock. Mary turns in her saddle, & looks back on beautiful Lawford dale covered in pure white snow - The Sun is setting, looking like a great round ball of fire - Turner never painted a sunset to equal this glory of crimson & gold, against the snow. Mary rides on <sup>the</sup> feeling awed by the sheer beauty of <sup>the</sup> world as God made it for us.

The door of Foxup farm is open, and the glow from the big, peat fire, can be seen.

The farmer and his wife are "fair capped," at the sight of the riders on such a day. They go in; & Mary is put on the old black oak long settle by the ingle nook.

Mrs. Knowles insists upon taking off the little shoes, & when she sees the dirt stockings, words fail her. but she says "my poor lamb, you must be fair frozzin." "to bed at once with a hot bottle, & then joy. I'll bring up a nice hot-poppitt with a drop o' rum in it."

I

Time marches on. In a year or two half the young men of Craven are courting Mary Cocksott - for besides being lovely - is by way of becoming an heiress for three days - her brother shows no sign of marrying - he has no time for such foolishness

On week days he is hoarding up his gold. his great ambition is to get enough to buy Bend Yats, a nice little farm near by.

He already has Deydale Head, $\frac{1}{2}$  acre and Old Ing.

His Sundays are spent preaching at a make shift Baptist Chapel at Helliwell, he holds forth for hours on the "carnal lusts of the flesh", to perishment by hell fire, etc

Among Mary's Suitors, is one, young

John Elsworth of Stanton Cotes - In Mary's eyes he is the handsomestyouth in all Craven, he is the finesthorseman, the best-dancer, he is gay, carefree & very charming - he is very tall, <sup>has</sup> a fine face, & wonderful violet-blue eyes; they are both deeply in love with each other.

When brother Thomas hears of this he is simply furious, "this must be stopped at once," he says. "John Elsworth is nowt but a wastrel, he has no brass, & never will have."

Poor Mary is practically shut-up in her bedroom, and old Ellen is set to watch her.

But as we all know "love laughs at locks & micks."

On one moonlight-night Mary slips off her little sandals carries them in her hand, creeps down the stairs, & out of the front-door; she winds round by the garden wall - at the end of the garden - where the gooseberry bushes still grow - she sees the grandest, young man in all Craven waiting for her on his blood mare, "Blossom".
He picks her up in his strong, young, arms (she is only a feather weight -) he holds her very firmly in front of him, & vows that nobody shall ever take her away from him again - as long as his life lasts -

Mary feels a bit frightened -

"Will de catch us Hunt you John?"
 "Catch us?" says John. "not I de d'el Missy can catch us, when we're on Blossom. She is I de swiftest mare on all Yorks d'is." Blossom pries up her ears, & with a neigh and a bound flies like the wind.

John has barely a crown in his pouch, & Mary - no down chest-for Mary - only her little reticule, which are clutched tightly to her, it contains one pair of black silk stockings (of good quality silk & with crosses) and six silver tea spoons marked C.

But they have what all the gold in the world cannot buy - youth, health, good looks. love. & each other. also superb courage.

~~God~~ God keeps them.

In the mean time, at Deepdale Head Thomas Coates is aroused by the neigh of a horse; he jumps out of bed, & rushes onto the landing, his night cap ditching.

He calls out - "Eleen do you hear out? is Mary alright?" Eleen goes to Mary's room, & comes out shaking with fright, & calls out "S does not here, S does gone wi young John Elsworth I'll be bound."

"What S doubts Thomas - that wastrel, I dare to what I say woman, * her shadow shall never darken my door again, nor her name spoke."

The house in the days to come is very quiet - the master counts up his gold, & thinks it won't be long now, before he buys Bengali. The old wales miss the gay, young, laughter, & the patter of little feet on the stone floors.

This boy de Ruygen and his wife.

Time marches on. The scene is changed we enter a small house in a poor part of Manchester.

John Elsworth is still gay & careless.
 Mary is still sweet, but looks a little careworn.

There are two little daughters.
 The elder, Margaret is a fine girl of about 7. Strong & long limbed, with her father's large violet eyes & she is full of life & joy. & with a heart of gold. ever as rich as Elsworth.

The younger girl Catherine is about 5. She is quiet & shy. She does not look strong. Her cheeks are pale & wan; she has her mother's grey eyes & auburn hair.

Mary looks at her wistfully - & thinks - if only Katie could have some pure Craven air

Good, new milk, & eggs straight from the nest. So would soon be strong & well - I wonder, she thinks dare I? ought I? Yes, I must. I will.
When John is out, she takes up her pen, & writes to her brother. (She has not heard anything from him all these years.)

"To brother Thomas -

Honoured Sir

I am sending my younger daughter into your safe keeping - She is somewhat delicate, tho Manchester air does not suit her health. I know you are a hard man & unforgiving - but you are also a just-man, honourable & God fearing man. I know you will bring up Catherine to be a good Christian & a virtuous maid.

Your humble & obedient Sister Mary Elsworth

I beg you to be kind to my baby for the sake of our childhood days - I doubt she will be oft sad and lonely.

Mary.

Catherine is sent to Deepdale Head.

There <sup>are</sup> lots of lonely evenings for Mary - when John is out, & Margaret is bed. She sits by the fire, & gazes into the flames, seeing faces & pictures. She fancied she saw again beautiful Lanstrath dale in her mantle of pure, white snow and the mantle of a sunset - the sun going down like a ball of fire - in all the glory of crimson & gold - She sometimes sees little Kate & looks for her.

The fire dies down & the pictures fade away - She is back in this murky, soiled, hateful Manchester. Does gallant little Mary regret? I wonder, I wonder.

Again time marches on, & again the scene is changed. They are now spending their old age in the Church hoot, a Cottage belonging to the Elsworth family. Close to the gates of the Parish Church at Long Preston -

I know nothing of "The Years between". John - in the eyes of his wife is still the finest man in Craven. Though now quite old, he is still happy - so lucky.

He spends his evenings at the Maypole with his old friends. Mary listens for his foot-steps coming home round the old lane, & she often hears his gay laugh, & snatches of song - though his walk is not always too steady; but - she never fails to greet him with a smile, never a reproach.

On a lovely Spring morning John & Mary Elsworth may be seen standing on their door steps looking up to the "Everlasting Hills", as He seen rises - They are a delightful old "Derby + Joan" he is still a fine man, + his little wife is still - as ever - dainty + sweet. barely reaching up to his elbows.

I doubt Stephen M. Kenma says
 "The greatest curse God put on humanity is not death but old age".
 In this case he is wrong - these two have indeed "grown old gracefully".

I think it must be because they have always had perfect love + trust in each other. all through the sunshine + shadows of a long life together - + of ten hard times.

How grand Rev. Loaf looks - just as though it were keeping guard over the old church and billings. Think of the centuries it has looked down on all the different vicars coming + going - of all the christenings - weddings + funerals of the people from one generation to another "Yes - & one day Rye Loaf will look down on us for the last time" Says Mary "wee joy -" John says "when we come to our journey's end, we shall still be together."

There comes one Sunday - when John Elsworth lies aying, the long limbs quiet at last. Mary sits by the bed holding his hand.

There is a knock on the door, an old friend comes in - he calls out "I have news for you"

"hush, hush, whispers Mary -

My master lies a aying - but what is your news?" "it is that Thomas Co. crostott of Ben Gate died this morn."

This news penetrates to the ears of the aying man, & gives down fictitious strength. He sets up & calls out "what did you say, Oud Tommie dead dunah" he jumps out of bed. Claps his hands, & dances a jig. saying "I'm better til <sup>at</sup> two yet." Then he falls back on his bed unconscious. Those were the last words he ever spoke.

 He was "game to the last."

---

Six tall farmers carry the huge coffin. shoulder high. across the road to where "The rude forgers of the Hamlet sleep."

They bury him among his own - the Reservoirs of Saints Cotes - his little wife turns away from the grave, & whispers - "Good night - my love I won't be long."

Not very long after she died at Bend Yall. where she had been living with her daughter Catherine. her little Coffin ~~was~~ placed beside "her man" they lie side by side in their last, long - sleep together.

God rest their souls.

Years later, when I was about 12, I opened a drawer in the old Elsworth corner cupboard & found "laid by in lavender", a pair of black silk stockings, with such tiny feet; also a row of auburn curls - which my mother told me Grandma always wore round her sweet face, with her Victorian poke bonnet - In another drawer were 6 silver tea spoons marked C. I have these spoons before me as I write - If they could they speak & give us their history - As a tale that is told.
